General Agosti, are generally identified with the so-called hard-line current of opinion, which favors harsh national security measures and opposes early conciliatory gestures toward civilian groups.

In the past week or so, Massera has directed thinly veiled public criticism at the President and his chief ally, army chief of staff General Viola.

ARGENTINA 63-66

The navy and air force members of Argentina's three-man military junta are expressing increased dissatisfaction with what they view as inordinate army influence in the regime. Admiral Massera in particular is indulging even more than usual his penchant for sniping at President Videla, commander in chief of the army.

Massera and his air force counterpart,

Massera may see some possibility that by discrediting Videla, he himself could emerge as president, a job he covets.

Chances are slim that Massera can, in the near future, engineer Videla's departure; it is even less likely that he could become president himself. The army is well established as the predominant service, and there is little evidence of active plotting within the army against the President.
